Excerpt: . . . the boy for a customer, and when he becomes grown up the chances are that you will still have him. The trick is to cater to him and to his father and mother at the same time. It is useless to attempt to hold his trade unless the merchant is fully aware of the fact that both the parents and the boy himself have it in their power to say whether his store or his competitors will have the trade. A dealer in a town of the Middle West makes it a policy to follow up with a personal letter every new family that moves into the community. He easily obtains the names of these new residents by keeping in touch with the real estate dealers and finding out to whom they rent their houses. When there are children in the family, the merchant addresses his letter of welcome to one of them. As a general proposition, this merchants store is the first one brought to the attention of the newly arrived family. The offer of a small inexpensive toy is Wally enough to bring the child at least to the store, and Oftener than not one of the parents usually accompanies the youngster. Sooner or later this store, which has in this manner become familiar, is patronized by the new residents. Another clothier offers a football free with every suit Of. clothes sold during the Fall season. This is something like the offer of...
